The reign of Mary Tudor ought to represent the clinching argument for this revisionist case. Mary brought England back to Roman obedience and, so far as we can tell, many people were rather pleased. The trouble is, it has never been easy to summon up much affection or respect for Mary's Catholic revivalism.

Mary was a devoted Catholic, and from the outset of her reign, she was determined to restore the Catholic faith in England. This had been widely suspected, and it was this knowledge that was a large factor in Northumberland's schemes. The restoration of the Catholic faith also worried a significant proportion of the nobility.
