Justine appartient à une petite communauté juive venue de Russie (fuyant sans doute les pogromes) et qui a trouvé refuge dans les quartiers pauvres de la ville. La misère de son environnement, enfant, est insoutenable. Là où elle dort, le sol est en terre battue et c'est là que circule la nuit une vaste colonie de rats.

In Justine, de Sade mercilessly exposes the hypocrisy of his own class - the elite and aristocracy of Paris at the time - using the intellectual language of the day to illustrate worthlessness of academia when used to pursue ultimate self-gratification. As with his other work, 'The Crimes of Love', the themes of good and evil, relative morality ...
